Interdependencies

History is both our mirror and our inspiration. The study of history is most effective when the topics are put into a relevant context that is connected to the learner. Through this study, children learn how the interdependency of geography, biology and socio-economic factors provide the answers to 'why' and 'how'.

The story of Canada can be taught in a variety of ways and from many perspectives. Presenting history in terms of satisfying the fundamental needs of humans provides the thread that links the important events in history. The learner can trace the tectonic movement of Canada to its current position on the earth. This leads to an exploration of the geographic position of Canada above the Tropic of Cancer, the angle of the sun's rays as they reach the land, and the pattern of its orbit around the sun. These all lead to an examination of how Canadians have satisfied their need for food, shelter, clothing, defence and community. This approach highlights both the differences and similarities of the vast country we call home.
