Evolve. Go beyond.

Early in the twentieth century, Maria Montessori offered a vision of the child that was contrary to the popular conception of the time. She used metaphors to assist others to gain a new image of the child and what he/she was capable of achieving, in childhood and beyond. Through the genius of Montessori we began to perceive the 'universal child.' Today, thanks to research and better understanding of brain development, we recognize the developmental milestones and are able to prepare the appropriate stimulating environment. The challenge is that the context in which the child is living has changed and the prevalent ideas regarding education and childhood differ significantly from Maria Montessori's time. At TMI we examine the child in light of the current climate and train teachers for 'fee-paying' schools.

One way in which we do this is through our Lab School experience. Elementary students are not only taught the 6 through 12 curriculum and the appropriate linkage materials but they also gain practical experience with the Children House child who will be entering their classrooms in September. Practical and direct contact with students helps to support realistic expectations and gain a current image of the child they will soon teach.

At TMI we take great pride in preparing our teachers in training to go beyond in meeting the evolving needs of the child. Please visit us at www.tmi.edu or call today to book your personal tour of our facilities and Lab School at 905.889.6882 ext. 242 or tmi@tmsschool.ca
